

CLASS SCHEDULE

ORAA x ED91b Workshop

Time	Wed
06.30	Dinner
06:45	Check-In
07:00	Stations
07.20	Stations
07.40	Reflection
08.00	Dismissal

station i:

what's a zine? why do we make them? what role do they play in movement organizing?

station ii:

what is the significance of alternative re-telling of AsAm histories?
what is our shared history?

station iii:

why did we make a blog? how was asamxpedagogies conceived and sustained?

what were some things you were hoping to take away from this experience?

- I hope to learn from others within this community about possible ways to reimagine student activism and education as well as activism and education in a broader scope for the future. I find that I often struggle to theorize new ways to envision a future for myself and those within my communities but I often get a clearer picture (or at least new framework of thinking) through engaged conversations with others who are thinking about similar concerns.
- want to be fed and full
- Thinking about Swat specifically
- Areas within the Swarthmore community and society as a whole that can do better to honor Asian heritage and culture as well as how I (non-Asian) can help
- Interested to learn more about liberatory pedagogy!
- :)
- Are there any specific actions to better apia futures?
- Look forward to learn more about the APIA community
- Learning about + engaging with the collective AsAm history timeline + zine making!
- Gain exposure to the wider apia community at swarthmore
- I want to learn more about Asian American history, which was skimmed over in history classes.
- I am looking forward to making a zine! ... and hanging out with my girlfriend :)
- Understanding the power of oral histories and learning more about alternative histories that have not been presented in my schooling so far.
- I'm a little familiar with what Black joy, liberatory pedagogy, freedom dreaming means in Black and Latinx contexts, but I'm interested in what joy, liberatory pedagogy, & freedom mean to AIPA people/students/youth more specially what is one thing you learned with us? what questions do u have now?